The nose of the 2024 Pingus is surprisingly harmonious, floral, perhaps a little more herbal, more subtle and not super showy or in your face, with some toast from the barrels at the core. He saved all the grapes from the frost of April 23-24 using burners. ("The candles and all the stuff cost me 60,000 Euros," explained Sisseck. "It was completely crazy, but we saved Pingus. After that, they installed big burners in the vineyard...") This was the first year when the temperature during the fermentation went up in a couple of vats, as the fermentation is quite stable and always done in the same way and in the same vats; but this time, the fermentations were a little more complicated. The wine is juicy and has fine tannins; it's not a showy vintage, perhaps a little in the style of 2014? There are some 23 or 24 barrels selected for Pingus at the moment, a little less than in 2023.

There was a big frost in 2024, and they could save 50% of their own vineyards with burners; so there were like two different harvests for the 2024 Flor de Pingus. The part that was frosted was riper and ripened faster, so they had to pick those grapes early to avoid too much alcohol because high alcohol interferes too much. They were very precise, and all the lots had 10% new barrels instead of having one lot all in new barrels. There are different lots, and he did a hypothetical blend of what the wine might be, including the press wine. The wine is very primary, clean, expressive and precise. It has a medium-bodied palate with fine tannins with some grip and a chalky feeling. There will be some 78,000 bottles, a lot less than in previous years, all because of the frost.

There's less Garnacha in the blend of the 2024 PSI, perhaps only 3% or 4%, because the grape suffered more with the frost at the end of April. It's primary and young and, at the moment, quite tannic and not easy to read. It has contained ripeness and quite a lot of grip; the tannins are still a little astringent, perhaps not as perfect in some previous years. This certainly needs time. It could have been another 2017, but they have a lot more experience and the result is much better. There will be around 320,000 bottles, slightly less because of the frost in their vineyards.
